XifYThe preparation of supported phosphatidylcholine bilayers and liposomes is a difficult and time consuming process. The problems are many and include the formation of small and irregular sized lipid vesicles. This problem is exacerbated when membranes are to be prepared from phosphatidylcholine/cholesterol mixtures. The present invention overcomes the difficulties mentioned above by providing a process for the simple and rapid preparation of phospholipid bilayers and liposomes. In addition to its simplicity, the present invention produces consistently uniform lipid vesicles, even when large amounts are required. Because of the time and equipment savings involved in the preparation of uniform lipid membranes the process of this invention should be amenable to industrial scale production. Phospholipids containing long chain alkyl groups have high melting points and tend to crystallize when cooled or exposed to low temperatures. This problem is well known to those skilled in the art and the higher melting temperature problems may be avoided by the addition of a long chain fatty acid to the phospholipid mixture. Generally the fatty acid will consist of eight or more carbons. When the fatty acid is added in the form of a salt, or quaternary ammonium salt, the melting point is lowered. The fatty acid may be added in either a covalent or ionic reaction to the lipid. Although the method of this invention produces uniformly sized bilayers, as with any other membrane preparation system, it is likely that some heterogeneity will exist. Both in vitro and in vivo experiments performed with lipid vesicles composed of phospholipids prepared by the method of this invention demonstrate that the lipid vesicles are well suited for in vivo use. There are numerous reports in the literature of the formation of lipid vesicles. The methods described in those reports normally involve the use of toxic solvents, expensive and/or toxic reagents, and generally produce a low yield of the liposomes. The preparation described in this invention is economical, does not require toxic solvents or reagents, and produces a high yield of liposomes. Numerous consumer electronic devices exist that generate large amounts of heat during operation, such as mobile phones, tablets, personal digital assistants (PDAs), smart watches, and the like.
